Fertilizer With Fall Seeded Small Grains Recommended

Extra bushels of small grain as well as more pasture can be obtained with little extra labor by the application of fertilizer. It is recommended that farmers use fertilizer on their small grain crops.

On soils which have been limed or that are naturally well supplied with lime and which the past year have grown good crops of lespedeza, sweet or red clover, which have been pastured and the land is plowed or disced or held cultivated at least a month or more before the small grain is sown, a fertilizer containing both phosphate and potash will likely give best results. Such fertilizer grades as an 0-14-7 or 0-20-10 are good for these conditions for wheat and barley.

Where legumes such as lespedeza or red clover have been grown the past season and have been removed for hay or pasture and the seedbed is prepared only a short time ahead of seeding the small grain, a complete fertilizer such as a 1-12-4 or a 2-12-6 will likely give somewhat better results than superphosphates alone or superphosphate and potash. The nitrogen supplied by the complete fertilizer will furnish the young small grain plant nutrients until the decomposition of the lespedeza and clover residues releases fertility for later use.

Soils which have been cropped heavily and which have not received applications of manure or recently grown legumes should also receive applications of complete fertilizers.

At the Ben Borgmann farm a similar livestock system is followed in the production of hogs and beef cattle with the use of pastures, however the tour at this farm included only the construction of terraces. Eight thousand nine hundred feet of terraces were constructed at this place. These terraces were built large enough to be easily worked over with farm equipment and are adequate to hold the heaviest rain that might occur. When combined with good farming practices, they will control the erosion on these fields.

Franklin County Bomber Pilot Reported Missing

Lieut. Waler Bolte, the Franklin county bomber pilot who returned to his flying base in England some time in June after visiting relatives near Union, was reported this week to be "missing in action since August 12 in action over Cologne, Germany." It is probable that Lieut. Bolte was flying "The Spirit of Franklin County," the bomber purchased early in the summer by Franklin county citizens. The ship was flown across in June to some point in England and was then put into action. It is also probable that Lieut. Bolte was not killed but was taken prisoner of war and will be heard from later.

Advertisement titled 'From where I sit...' by Joe Marsh. Text: 'Almost everybody's figuring what things'll be like after the war. I talked about that today and here's what I think. You're a veteran of the last war—you're a thing's sure, Joe. The boys this time won't return and find what we came back to. "Passin' laws behind our backs," he says, "was violatin' just what we were fightin' for. The very principle America fought for in 1776. Law-makin' without representation that's one of the most undemocratic things that ever happened. We don't need prohibitory laws now, any more than we did before. What we need is constant support of the laws we've got. Where malt beverages are concerned, the Brewing Industry Foundation's main objective is to help retailers observe the law, as well as the letter of the law. And from where I sit, that system's working so well there's no reason for slipping over any prohibitory laws under the sun we see this time. Joe Marsh'
