Early St. Louis Hotspots Showed City's Rapid Growth

slave or private soldier of the United States army without license from the master, mistress or an officer of the United States army.

When Missouri reached statehood in 1820, St. Louis was a thriving town. William Christy built a house of public entertainment where he offered liquors of the best kind, and picture shows horses will be paid the strictest attention to.

The "French trading post" was soon to become a city.

Looking Ahead

Citizenship
A farmer of my acquaintance has a knife he wouldn't sell for a ransom less than ten dollars.

The knife is of a kind that could be manufactured in quantity to retail for less than ten dollars.

The farmer's son took it from a Japanese for the cost, not its worth.

One of the strangest quirks of human nature is the backward tendency they exhibit according to what they cost instead of according to what they are worth.

A man who falls heir to a fortune without effort is much more liable to squander than his neighbor who may have acquired a similar amount the hard way; his wealth cost him too little.

A Thin of Value
It's like American citizenship, a thing of great value that costs too little. The fee exacted from an immigrant when he gets out his papers is not a drop in the sea compared to what he gets.

Moreover, the vast majority of Americans acquired citizenship rights with their feet crossed here. We grew up with citizenship. We have always had it and consequently don't appreciate it as we should.

We must realize the history of how British citizenship about the time America was being colonized, was only coveted by noble Europeans who fled France as refugees.

Alfaguet in Carthage, was familiar with New Testament accounts of his race, even though he was spared more than once because he, although an Israelite, was born a privileged citizen of Rome.

An Expensive Item
Roman citizenship at that time could be bought, and it cost a great price. It had a great value, too, but it would not be nearly as much as our American citizenship, that costs so little.

But we must realize that the United States ought to be educated for citizenship. Not many are of that nature of naturalized citizens. Not everybody needs a college degree but every body needs to appreciate his freedom.

Americans must be conscious of their citizenship for a long time back of a century ago. Government hold the spotlight of youth's attention. In the last hundred years, however, invention has intruded the interest of more and more American boys. Unfortunately it has been in something spells relative indifference to something else, and engineering has had government in almost total eclipse.

History's Very Heart
John Tyler was President a century ago. In 1844 Louisa M. Alcott was ten, enjoying the blissful childhood she so beautifully preserved in print. But what age the people were aged that year at the world's first telegraph line, one between Washington and another in Baltimore.

Little boys were eagerly flattening their noses against window panes to see that new invention, a boy's game by.

These five generations of high scientific achievement are not to be despised. In them, our wage levels and national income have made America the envy of a necessary world. But the foundation for all this is laid by George Washington's day and John Tyler's.

The science of self government must regain its rightful place in the field of learning if we Americans are to hold on our living standards. Our youth must better appreciate the role and privileges of citizenship, its cost and its value.

Poker Expert

A United Press dispatch dated Jan. 3 at London says that Pres. Roosevelt plays a good game of poker, according to the "Talk of the Day" column in the London Evening Times.

The column said: "I was talking to a civil servant just back from Washington and I asked him what made the sharpest impression on him there. Trying to beat Pres. Roosevelt at poker," he said. "I suppose there are people who could win money from him at poker but there can't be many of them. I know I couldn't—and I imagine I'm not a complete sufferer at it."
